Gilberto Ramirez (46-1, 30 KOs), Mexico's first-ever super middleweight world champion, has steadily worked his way up through the light heavyweight and now cruiserweight divisions. Known for his southpaw stance, relentless pressure, and high punch output, Ramirez combines volume and precision to break opponents down. After suffering his first career loss to Dmitry Bivol, Zurdo bounced back impressively and is now looking to prove he belongs at the elite level in the 200-pound division.

Standing in his way is Cuba's Yaniel Dorticos (26-2, 24 KOs), one of the most feared punchers in the cruiserweight ranks. A former IBF champion and World Boxing Super Series finalist, Dorticos has a reputation for ending fights in spectacular fashion. Though he's had setbacks against top-tier opponents like Mairis Briedis and Murat Gassiev, Dorticos remains a major threat to anyone who dares trade punches with him. His 92% knockout ratio speaks for itself.

This matchup is as compelling as it is dangerous. Ramirez will look to use his footwork, volume, and ring IQ to frustrate and outbox Dorticos over the distance. On the other hand, Dorticos will be aiming to cut off the ring and unleash his trademark power shots. If Ramirez gets drawn into a firefight, it could spell disaster — but if he sticks to his plan, he may be able to outlast the Cuban slugger.

Both men are former champions with something to prove. The winner could be on the fast track to another world title shot, while the loser may face serious questions about their future at the top level.
